

LIGHTS AND SHADOWS OF A CITY

AS SEEN BY A SALT LAKE WOMAN

It does not seem quite right that our teachers, whose income barely carries them through the year, should be expected to contribute to everything in the way of special funds, entertainments, exhibitions, etc., simply to add still more to the good of the cause. The actual every day grind of teaching the young idea ought to suffice for the good of the cause.

There were teachers who contributed to the cadets' going away fund, and they simply had no business to do it; they should not have been permitted to do it. Besides it meant not only the going away fund proper, but it meant buy tickets for this, and for that, and as many as you possibly can, to swell the sum to be added to the fund.

There are teachers who can barely save enough to cover their expenses through vacation because of heavy calls upon them from others and more essential causes, and then, in their strenuous effort to be economical, they are unkindly and unjustly called near, or close, and some even say stingy.

One young woman contributed to the going-away fund, and to every affair devised for the making up of said fund, because she is conscientious and loves her school work, and is a loyal and true to the cause, and everybody knows the call upon her at home, since its main support was taken away.

Another splendid girl, after buying a ticket to this, and a ticket to that, and several tickets to some other thing, went home and wept because she was unable to contribute with the other teachers to the general fund. She was sensitive, too, lest the rest of them find she had not done so, and might think her sadly lacking in generosity, and proper loyalty to the cause. Taking her circumstances into consideration, she had, as it was, given far more than she really could afford to. It meant self-denial in many little essentials, which is all wrong, for she is not strong.

"Half my salary pays our rent," said one little tired-looking teacher one day, "and by the time I go the rounds of all that goes toward the good of the cause, financially, there's little left for myself."

This girl was not selfish, she was anything but close, but some people we know hearing her make this statement would have so misjudged her. The teachers must lead out in all the little devices for raising money in the schools, and it is mighty hard on them, the self-supporting ones. Of course, there are the few fortunate ones who live at home, and fond parents gladly providing their living and all home comforts, and whose salaries being clear gain, mainly go toward trips. These are not included in this little talk about the unjust calls upon struggling self-supporting teachers.

"My home is a long way from here, and over and above my actual clothes and living expenses, it takes all I can save to cover my railroad fare to and from home, and I always send something home, besides; my mother is a widow and entirely dependent upon my sisters and myself for support."

Many go home for the summer and are most lucky in having homes to go to, but even then it is nip and tuck to come out square. A young woman went from the train to her boarding place one fall, and her first words to the landlady were these: "I cannot pay anything in advance on my room. Can you wait till my first pay day?" Otherwise, I must borrow I guess. I've 50 cents for my trunk, and car fare for half the month."

Thus it is. The average teacher is obliged to count the pennies, and then she gets the name of "close."

Three teachers were talking in the car. Two were brimming with joy over contemplated trips; they lived at home under no expense. "What are your plans," they said to the one.

"I must teach this summer, else take something in an office. I keep up the home, and funds simply cannot stop with the closing of school. I've been quite unable to save this year."

The competent teacher must be progressive. She must attend "summer school," somewhere, if possible. Think of going to school immediately following the long nine months' grind of teaching! It is so much along the road of advancement if a teacher can go east to attend school. So through the long school year she saves and denies herself in order to meet enormous railroad fare and expense of living while attending some eastern summer school. For the good of the child and the cause, she must do all this at her own expense and there is certainly something not quite fair about it.

If there are among God's creatures any more loyal, more zealous, more unselfish workers, than our school teachers, one does not care to seek them. Our teachers are good enough for us.

For the good of the cause they give all they possess, mentally, physically, materially, financially, and in the end there seems little left for themselves, save the satisfaction, maybe, of work well done, and the glory they may patiently look forward to reaping in the life to come. Even this can grow wearisome and monotonous without a little diversion thrown in, occasionally.

"Tis nobleness to serve," but surely this does not mean to the point of extinction. To live and dress plainly, modestly, in one place, in one rut, year in, year out, with nothing more expected than—

An hour ago 'twas nine
'Twill soon be quitting time;
Simple supper at seven Hours of sleep 'ere eleven,

the struggle would be easy. But when a teacher must not think of self, but the child and the cause, from start to finish, year in, year out, life in, life out, surely the least that can be done for her is to aid in making her expenses lighter in every possible way, that she may be given a chance during vacation to gather her forces mentally, physically, financially for the ensuing year. And a mighty aid in lessening her calls to pay out, and swelling her little bank account for the summer months would be in relieving her of any and all contribution to the numerous and sundry school affairs, that make for so large an amount in the long run. Our teachers should have every chance for saving through the school year else how can they live through vacation?

THEODORE I. ESTES.

WOMEN ERECT MONUMENT.

A monument to the memory of Theodore I. Estes, son of Sheriff and Mrs. William K. Estes, of Oak Ridge, Nelson county, Va., was unveiled Wednesday, the first anniversary of the death of the young man who was shot and killed by ex-Judge William G. Loving, manager of Thomas F. Ryan's Nelson county estate, Oak Ridge, because of alleged wrongs offered his young daughter Elizabeth.

She was taken home by Estes, following a buggy ride, in a semiconscious condition, the father being led to believe that the girl had been drugged and then assaulted.

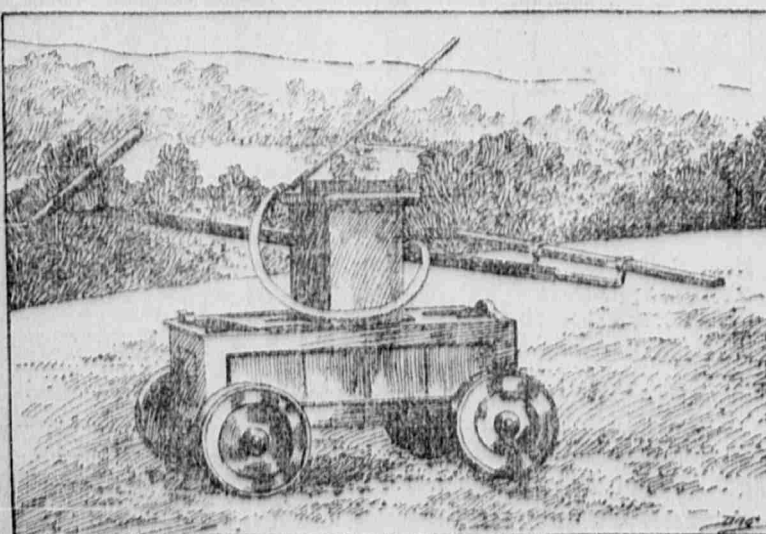

The monument is the work of the women of Nelson county, as an evidence of their faith in the integrity of the young man. The monument stands on a hill overlooking the village of Lovingsington. The unveiling ceremony was without speechmaking and without ostentation. The women who had been instrumental in erecting the shaft placed spring flowers on the grave of the young man.

This inscription is engraved on the shaft:
In Memoriam
THEODORE IRYING ESTES,
Born January 8, 1890,
Died April 22, 1907.

Erected to his memory by the friends who knew and loved him; and by those in many States who, not knowing him, asked to pay their tribute also to innocence and worth.

"Stoop, angels, hither from the skies;
There is no holier spot of ground
Than this, where manly virtue lies
In mourning woman crowned."

AN ANCIENT HAND FIRE ENGINE.

The antiquated fire engine shown in the cut is the Cascade, which was brought to this country from England more than a century ago. It was imported by a man named Vaughan and is now the property of the heirs of the original owner at Hallowell, Me.
